Microsoft was found guilty in this case. They have a history of similar behavior (examples include DR-DOS and Stac Electronics). They are currently targeting Real Networks using similar tactics to the ones used against Netscape.

I do not believe that the proposed final judgement will restrain Microsoft's anticompetitive conduct. It does not appear to do anything to remedy the effects of their past unlawful conduct.

Their current .Net initiative attempts to leverage their desktop monopoly to gain a dominant position online services. They should not be allowed to do this.
